

Advanced Journalism (W224238)

Articles from The New York Times

Advanced Journalism is a hands-on course that focuses on the fundamentals of reporting and writing articles. It is not a traditional English class, and neither is the summer reading for this course!

In order to prepare you to think and write like a journalist, this summer you will spend time reading a variety of articles using the New York Times subscription provided for by the school library: <https://newtrier.libguides.com/nytimes>

You will also be required to read articles posted weekly in the class Google Drive folder, which can be accessed here:

<https://drive.google.com/drive/folders/1NZ5ISO1UsNYsHEC4CZdXUToabky6QL3j?usp=sharing>

The requirement will be to read five articles each week from a variety of sections including news (national, international, politics, local), sports, opinions and a variety of feature articles from the Arts, Books, Style, Food, Travel and Magazine sections.

Walla Walla, Wash. With some people expressing eagerness to get the coronavirus, officials in Walla Walla, Wash., are investigating two parties at which infected people were present. Nik Wheeler/Alamy

By Mike Baker

Published May 6, 2020 Updated May 7, 2020, 12:04 a.m. ET

Save Button

Use the save feature to keep a list of the articles you read and be ready to return to them for a class project during the first weeks of class.

SEATTLE — Amid growing impatience over stay-at-home orders and rising unemployment, public health experts have worried that some people may try to expose themselves to the coronavirus in a risky bid to gain immunity.

One fear is the prospect of “coronavirus parties” much like the